In today's increasingly globalised and interdependent world, the concept of a nation's borders has never been more difficult to define, nor more important. How do we define our borders? Is it the edge of our territorial sea? Or our Exclusive Economic Zone? Does a hacker attacking a server on Australian soil constitute a breach of our borders? How do we protect our borders from pandemics when populations move easily and regularly at will? If the polluting of a neighbouring nation causes an erosion to our shoreline, is our territorial integrity under threat?

This Congress, "Protecting Our Borders: Future Challenges in a Globalised World", will provide Young Strategic Leaders with the opportunity to engage with senior officers from across Government, including the Deputy National Security Advisor and senior representatives from the agencies at the forefront of addressing these challenges now and into the future. They will present a frank and open assessment of our current challenges and future trends which will help build participants understanding and provide rare insights on border security issues. Participants will have the opportunity to not only meet and discuss the issues with these leaders, but also to analyse and debate those issues through seminars, networking, syndicate and panel discussions.

Professional leadership and management development sessions, alongside informal networking opportunities will also assist participants with their professional development. At the friendly, relaxed, picturesque ANU Coastal Campus, this weekend is sure to build an esprit de corps, expand your personal networks, and provide a unique opportunity to develop your knowledge of the future challenges faced pursuant to protecting Australia's borders in a globalised context.
